In Morocco, Illegitimate Children Struggle for Rights

Rachel Woolf
SIT Graduate Institute - Study Abroad, rwoolf1@gmail.com

Lauren Kopchik
SIT Graduate Institute - Study Abroad, lkopchik@mail.smcvt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcollections.sit.edu/moj

Part of the Journalism Studies Commons

Recommended Citation

http://digitalcollections.sit.edu/moj/6

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Independent Study in Journalism (ISJ) Collection at SIT Digital Collections. It has been accepted for inclusion in Morocco: Field Studies in Journalism and New Media by an authorized administrator of SIT Digital Collections. For more information, please contact digitalcollections@sit.edu.
In Morocco, Illegitimate Children Struggle for Rights
Photo Essay by Rachel Woolf
Abdelaziz, 10, sits and looks into the kitchen while his mother, Aziza Mohammed Kanzi, 39, folds clothes behind him. Kanzi’s 4 illegitimate children live with her in a small shack in the slums of Sahb Al Caid in Salé. "[My children] will blame me for this poor life conditions," Kanzi said.
Abdelaziz gets water outside of his home to bring to his mother for dishes. The children become independent during the day and either play outside or run errands for their mother.
From left, Abdelaziz & Sifeddine, 6, wrestle each other on a cushion in their house. Kanzi describes her children “like a gang, or a futbol team.”
Aziza Mohammed Kanzi smiles at her daughter, Marwa, 1, before letting her fall asleep. “I don’t want them to be like me, I want them to get education and hopefully work in the future,” Kanzi said.
Aziza Mohammed Kanzi washes her daughter, Marwa's hands after she got into mud around the slums of Sahb Al Caid in Salé.
Aziza Mohammed Kanzi stands alone with her daughter, Marwa, on her back in her shack watching TV. "I'm living in a crisis, I'm fed up with this situation. Sometimes, I just think about leaving everything and never coming back," Kanzi said.